

Overview

Sound Transit is considering offering a low-income adult fare to align with King County Metro's program and ensure fare consistency for low-income riders. To offset revenue loss, other fares (for other adults, youth, seniors and people with disabilities) would be raised by 25 cents. The Sound Transit Board is considering several fare change options and is seeking public comment on them. If Sound Transit adopts fare changes, it will aim to implement them at the same time as Metro.

In March 2015, Metro is implementing a discounted fare of $1.50 for adult riders with incomes at or below 200% of federal poverty level* and increasing fares by 25 cents for other riders. Transit partners in Snohomish and Pierce counties are not pursuing the low-income program.

* To qualify, a household of four would have an annual household income at or below $47,700.

Low-income certification and card distribution would be available only at locations in King County. Eligible riders would be issued special ORCA cards allowing them to pay the reduced fare. Income eligibility would be determined through partner agencies, like Public Health – Seattle and King County, which routinely do such work and would also help distribute and manage the ORCA cards.
